GitHub.com is the source code for the world's largest and most famous version control system, Git. Committers use Git to collaborate and track changes to the project for simple, private development. In contrast to popular distributed version control systems, Git is decentralized by design and supports concurrent development by multiple users without the need for complex locking. What can Git do for me? Git can be used for all kinds of projects with local and distributed workflows. Those that have a centralized workflow using a DVCS (Distributed Version Control System) like Git can use it to secure private source code and to make it easier to collaborate with friends, colleagues and collaborators around the world. Git was originally developed as a generic DVCS, but in practice it's most often used to manage the Linux kernel source code. Whether a project is using Git as its version control system or not can be seen through its license. All in all, Git offers many advantages over other systems. First of all, it's distributed. The main downside of this is the need to always stay synchronized and update the entire repository whenever changes are done. This is achieved by keeping a complete record of all changes. Some of the benefits you can enjoy by using Git are:

- The speed Git can push commits very fast
- The separation of the branches Git separates branches and allows users to make branches for different tasks or even to fork projects
- Upstream and downstream Git uses "upstream" and "downstream" for tracking changes
